CASE F 59028.5

THE NEWBERRY
LIBRARY

Learne OF A TVRK,

OR

Instructions and Advise sent from the Turkish Army at Constantinople, to the English Army at London.

Faithfully and Impartially communicated by M B. one of the Attendants of the English Agent there.

Eccles. 1. 9.

The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be, that which is done, is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the Sun.

LONDON,
Printed in the first moneth of the great Platonick year, Called anciently by some in English, As you were. 1660.

case F59028.5

LOUIS

OF A

TURK,

OR

The Actions and Advice from thence

English Army at Constantinople, to the English Army at Leyden.

Faithfully and Impartially communicated by M. B. one of the Attendants of the English Agent there.

LONDON,
Printed in the first month of the great Plotonick year,
Called anciently by some in English, 1683.

To the Reader.

READer, Although thou haſt not much skill in forreign Names, yet if thou haſt any little skill in Domeſtick affairs, thou mayeſt out of this diſcourſe pick ſome knowledge of our Miſeries paſt: of our Miſeries preſent, with the root and ſpring of them, and of the moſt probable means of redeeming them for the future. God make our Grandees in the Army, and out of the Army, wiſe by the harmes of others (they that build much upon the confidence of an Army, build upon a quick-ſand) And God make them honeſt after the Example of others, or elſe the men of Niniveh ſhall riſe up in judgement againſt this Government, Matth. 12. 41. And the Turks Circumciſion ſhall judge and condemn theſe mens Baptiſme, yea, though it be Anabaptiſme.

JAN 11 '33 Fol

D25117

The meaning of ſeveral Names mentioned in the following diſcourſe.

Janizaries. The Turks foot ſouldiers.
Spahies. The Troopers or Horſemen.
Seraglio. The great Turks Palace.
Divan. The publick Councell.
Sanrack. A Colonel.
Beg. A petty Lord or Governour of a ſmall Province.
Beglerbeg. A great Lord that hath many beys under him.
Segmen Baſſa. The Lieutenant General of the foot.
Imbrahir Baſſa. The Maſter of the Horſe.
Boſtangi Baſſa. The chief Gardiner, who is ordinarily the Turks Executioner.
Aga of Janizaries. Captain General of the foot.
Baſſa. The greateſt Commander and Governour the Turk hath abroad.
Vizier a Baſſa. Called from abroad, and made of the Councel at home.
Grand Vizier. The Lieutenant General of the Empire, Viceroy, the ſecond man in the Kingdome.
Chimacham. The third man in the Kingdome, Deputy to the grand Vizier.
Teſtardar. The Treaſurer.
Cadeleſcher. The chief juſtice.
Caſſiaraga. The Governour of the women.
Capi Aga. The Emperours mouth by whom he ſpeaks in publick.
Hoia. The Emperours Confeſſor.
Mufti. The High-Prieſt of the Mahumetans. Their Pope.

Achmat

ACHMAT, eighth Emperour of the Turks ſuddenly dying, Novemb. 15. 1617. Left behinde him three ſons, but all under age; wherefore by the advice, eſpecially of his mother Flatua, who was mother both to him and Muſtapha, he appointed his brother Muſtapha his ſucceſſout in the Empire, who by a ſpecial providence had been (contrary to the manner of the Turks, whoſe Emperours ſlay all their brethren as ſoon as they aſcend the Emperial Throne) reſerved thus for the Scepter. This Muſtapha had not long raigned, but that growing cruel and odious, the Grand Vizier came with an Army out of Perſia and depoſed him, forcing him to returne to his Cell (where he had lived like a relgious man all the Reign of Achmat his Brother) and fetching Oſman, the heire of Achmat, out of priſon, ſet him in the Imperial Throne, with the general applauſe of all the Baſſaes and whole Army, and this in the year 1618. Sed fourtuna vitrea eſt, cum ſplendet maxime frangitur. This young Prince was ſcarce well warm in his fathers Seat: But taking diſcontent at his ſouldiery, eſpecially the Janizaries, he had a deſign upon them to disband and diſarme them, if not wholly deſtroy them, and erect another Militia in their roome. To cover which deſigne of his the better, he gave out a pretenſion of a Voiage to Mecha, to viſit the Sepulchre of their great Prophet, from which uundertaking no Reaſons, Adviſes, Petitions could diſſwade him, although the ſouldiery paſſed ſo far, as to threaten publickly, and

The Army upon an apprehenſion of a deſign to disband them and to protest they would not follow, but rather set up another King in his absence. On Wednesday they seventh of May in the year 1622. while his Tents and other accommodations for his journey were passing over unto Asia-side, the Janizaries and Spahies suddenly met at the Hyppodrome in the City, upon a word given, and from thence ran to the Seraglio, which is the great Turks Palace, in tumult, and there cryed out for the King, who appeared to them, asked what this insolency meant, and what they pretended? They then by the mouth of the multitude (for they had no head but that of the Monster) demanded, First, that he should not proceed in his purpose to go to Mecah, nor to Asia. Secondly, to have delivered to their fury the great Vizier Delevir Bassa, the Hoia, or the Cassiaraga, the Teftardar, the Cadelescher, and some others as Enemies to the State. The first after a little dispute, the King granted to them, promising to give over his journey; but they not content with words, exacted it in writing. To the second he replyed, that it was dishonour to him to have his servants so used without order of Justice, but perswaded them to have patience to stay till Saturday the Divan or publick Councel, where they should appeare; and if they were found culpable, they should receive punishment (not meaning to performe any of this, but to get time and allay their present fury.) These fellows not content with that moderate answer, undertook to know that they were guilty, and therefore they needed no other Witnesse, Tryal, or Judge but themselves, and with extreame clamour called to have them rendred. But the King refusing to give them any other satisfaction, and they unprepared for force, returned into the City, which now was all in feare; every house and shop being shut up, expecting a general sack. But they followed the way of their own hatred, and first went to the house of the Hoja, which they brake and pillaged; But not finding him, they proceeded to the great Viziers, who made some defence, and they being unarmed, beat them off: and so they separated, being now evening, yet kept a guard in some parts of the Town.

Mutiny.

Demand some chief Officers of State to justice, which the King denying,

That night the King made an attempt to fortifie and defend

defend the Seraglio, which was ſtrongly walled about, and had alwayes in it of houſhold ſervants, above three thouſand; but it ſeems no man would arme in his cauſe: So the next morning the mutiniers aſſembled againe, and taking their armes, went firſt to the Mufti, or Arch-Prieſt among them, and enforced him and divers others to accompany them to the Court, where they anew demanded theſe men, but with more inſtance and fury; in the mean time the Hoia Cadeleſcher and Tofterdar fled; and were not in long time diſcovered; the Vizier retired to the King, and perſwaded him earneſtly to go over in perſon in his own boates to Aſia, and there to take horſe, and he would ſecure him from all peril; but the King would not move, bidding him ſtay, confident and aſſured that he would puniſh theſe rebels.

They aſſemble in Arms next morning.

The wiſe old man ſeeing this conſtancy (or obſtinacy) deſired leave to ſhift for himſelf, which he took or obtained, and ſo got away to the Hermitage of a Saint renowned amongſt them, who (like himſelf) betrayed him; yet did him the favour, as not to deliver him to the multitude, but perſwaded and carried him back to the Kings houſe. At this time it was diſputed in the Seraglio about the delivery of thoſe Officers, the Emperour refuſing; the rebels clamouring and threatning, inſomuch as he began to feare they would break in, and in their rage do worſe then they yet pretended. Whereupon (whither by the Kings order, or by his own conſent willing to be the peace-offering) the brave Vizier went out to them, and with a good aſſuredneſſe demanded what they ſought of him, and wherein he had offended? "At firſt they were amazed, but one "inſolent villain breaking the general modeſty, they an- "ſwered him with their ſwords, and ſuddenly cut him in "pieces.

Cut the Vizier in pieces.

The Emperour ſeeing their fury ſo outragious, had more cauſe to doubt, and retired himſelf then too late, when he had loſt his faithful Councellour, and would have fled into Aſia, but could not; yet he conveyed himſelf into a private place prepared by his Boſtangi Baſſa, or chief Gardiner. The Rebels continued without in their madneſſe, asking for their Force the Emperour to hide himſelf.

King

King, and for more sacrifices. But the Servants protesting they knew not where he was, they resolved to enter the Palace ("but first took a general Oath not to sack the Im-"perial Throne, which they called their house and their "honour) and there seeking for the King, but not able to find him, they extorted it by confession from the Cassiaraga, & slew him; and then they demanded for the deposed Mustapha, Uncle to Osman, a man esteemed rather holy (that is frantick) then wise, and indeed fitter for a Cell then a Scepter. The King the first day of this tumult had put Mustapha into a Vault with two Negro women, without bread or drink, in which estate these new Electors found him almost naked and half pined. At first sight he thought they had been the Messengers of death, but that fear passed over; his first request was a cup of water, whom they took up and instantly proclaimed him their Emperour, which he was loath to accept, in a manner ashamed to be raised to that dignity. How unstable are the states of the greatest Princes? "For he that was even now in the jaws of death, "naked, starved, and dying for thirst, is become a great Mo-"narch, may drink gold, or the innocent blood.

The mutiniers missing him set up a mock-King.

They as yet not knowing what was become of Osman, and loath to trust Mustapha in the Palace, carried him in triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him, departing to the sack of the Viziers house, and so in the evening to their Rendevous, where they kept both good guard, and good order in the City from fire and other insolencies. Sultan Osman amazed with these newes, assoone as they had left the Court, came out, and called to Counsel in the night Hurein Bassa, late Vizier in the Polish Wars, and the Aga of the Janizaries, both faithful to him, and demanded their advice; first having sent to the old Seraglio to practise the women there to strangle Mustapha; but some of them taking his part, a new uproare began in the house between that sex; and the Souldiers that kept watch, hearing the noise, entred in, and rescued him; and from thence removed him to the Chambers of the Janizaries, where they kept him for that night in an ill lodging.

All

All this while Osman is consulting what course to take; these two his friends and some others tell him, that the case was desperate, and could not be cured but by a desperate remedy, and therefore they agreed that the Aga should go and perswade with the Mufti; and that the King in the morning should suddenly present himself to the souldiers at their own doors, and make experience what his presence, his submission and his benevolence promised, would work, to move them to loyalty or compassion: which counsel early in the morning they put in practise. The King accompanyed with the Mufti (who never consented to his deposing, though he favoured the souldiers against the Vizier with Huzein Bassa) and about twelve horsemen went directly to the Janizaries Colledge, where Mustapha was kept, and there in teares made them an Oration, offering great recompense, repenting of his errours, and finally invoked them by the merits of his father, and all his Ancestours to have some pity upon their true Master. "The "multitude (as prone to pity as they were before to hatred) "now knew not what to do; a silent murmure now ran "among them, and they were half converted. But the Aga of the Janizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead unseasonably for him, with some harsh words of upbraidure, anew moved their fury, so that they cryed out TREASON, and fall upon him and Huzein Bassa, and cut them in pieces; every man taking a piece of their flesh to satiate their revenge. The Mufti would have spoken, but was withdrawn by some, out of respect to his place, and with difficulty was conveyed away. Now the poor Osman saw his friends slain, and knew not which way to turne himself; but binding up his eyes with a napkin, expected death as the last of their fury. But that they might seem to proceed in a course of JUSTICE, they carried him first before Mustapha, and accused him as the disturber of the peace of the Empire, and demanded sentence against him. More vulgi, suum quisque flagitium aliis objectans. The forsaken Prince pleaded for life, and the new King knew not how to condemne, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At last they consulted with themselves, and

The true King addresseth himself to the souldiers.

They begin to relent,

But being anew enraged by the rashness of one of his attendants, they

Attach him;

Arraign him as a disturber of the peace.

Commit him to prison,

put him upon a horse, an insolent Spahi, changing Turbants with him, and sent him away prisoner to the seven Towers under good guard (in his passage begging a draught of water at a fountain) and then returned to their new Master, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperial Throne, where he had need have good broths and analepticks to restore his decayed body.

The souldiers now thought all was done, and onely sacking the houses of Hurein Bassa, and some others, returned in quiet to their several lodgings, and had no further malice. But the new Vizier Daout Bassa made by Mustapha, knew well if Osman lived, that this storm might passe over, and he would as eafily by the same means, returne to his estate as he fell from it; therefore he consulted with some few interessed in Mustapha's preferment, and thereby obnoxious to Osman, to search how many of the Royal Blood were left alive; and resolved, if there remained two, to make an end of Osman. Two of his brothers were found, the one about twelve, the other about seven years of age; and thereupon the Vizier went himself to the prison with a pack of hangmen, and gave order to strangle the unfortunate Prince, who now having had no rest in two nights, and thinking himself secure for a season, was newly fallen asleep, but awakened by the coming of these Messengers, asked what News? saying, he did not like their sudden intrusion. They at first stood amazed, and the King made shew to defend himself. But a strong knave struck him on the head with a Battle-axe, and the rest leaping upon him, strangled him with much ado. "Thus one of the greatest Mo-
"narchs in the world was first affronted by his mutined
"Troops, his own slaves, almost unarm'd, and few in num"ber, no man taking up sword to defend him; and they
"who first began this madnesse, not meaning to hurt him,
"by the encrease of their own fury, which had no bounds,
"deposed him against their own purpose; and at last exposed
"his life, against their will, to the Counsels of other
"men, whom they equally hated. And now they mourned
"for their dead King as freshly as they raged (while he lived)
"unreasonably, knowing that they had stained their honour;

Where he is murthered.

"this

" this being the first of their Emperours that they ever " betrayed, and having set up another, that in all likelihood " they must change for disability.

Some observations upon this occasion will not be impertinent to these that desire to know, as well the disposition and use as the things themselves.

First, in the purpose of the souldier not at all to violate the King, much lesse to depose or murther him, but onely to take away these about him, whom they lookt upon as enemies; yet the fury once on foot, they proceeded by unsensible steps to the utmost of outrage, against the Throne and life of their own Emperour, ubi furor invaluit innocentes & noxios juxta tollit, where rage and fury hath got the upper hand, there the Innocent and nocent fare both alike.

Secondly, observe how this Monarch fell by degrees; he had never fallen thus low, if he had not first lost the awe and Reverence which alwayes attendeth upon Majesty (if it be kept up) by unseemly offices done by him; and now in this last act, if his own obstinacy had not plunged him into destruction, a seasonable yeelding to time, had softned them, and saved him.

Thirdly, in the order, that these Mutiniers having no head nor direction, kept such Regiment, that in their fury, in their hot blood, in the Kings-yard they took an Oath not to sack nor dishonour the Imperial Throne; neither committed nor suffered any violence in the City to the Naturals, but rather proclaimed peace and justice.

Fourthly, in the consequents, that at the third dayes end all was quiet, and all men in their trade, as if no such thing had happened; onely the Janizaries suffered no Divan or Counsel, until they had received a Donative as a reward of their iniquity. And now these fellows having tasted the sweet of prosperous Mutinies (haud ignari summa scelerd incipi cum periculo perfeci cum præmio) knowing that the greatest wickednesses are begun with hazard, but perfected with reward, took such an head as could not safely be suffered on, nor securely taken off.

On Saturday morning, the 1. of June following, the Capi

Aga, or Major Domo having received an Order to remove the brethren of Osman from their Lodgings, and in the night to strangle them, as he was performing his command, the poor Princes cryed out, the Pages running to the noise, and encouraged by the Cassiaraga, who had some suspition, without further examination, killed the Capiaga. That night they sent secretly to the Janizaries and Spahies to inform them what they had done, and in the morning early hanged his body in the Hippodrome for a publick spectacle. The souldiers returned in fury to the Court in favour of the Pages, and demanded justice of those that had consented to the wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; onely this Mustapha being left alive, who was such a Saint, that he would not people the world with sinners, nor endure any woman near him. The innocent King protested, he knew nothing of the plot, and if such command were procured, it was gotten by subreption; and he was easily believed. But his mother and the new Vizier Daout Bassa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently suspected. It was a day of Divan, but the souldiers would suffer none, till they had an account of this Treason. The Vizier denyed all: the mother was a woman, and hid in the house. But now somewhat must be done to appease the people; therefore Daout Bassa was degraded from his Office, and one Hurein Bassa, new arrived from the Government of Cairo, put in his place, with promise of further examination. But the fury once over, there was no great search nor discovery made.

The army mutinies a second time;

☞

Occasions the Creation of a new Vizier,

The new Vizier audax ferox, & prout animum intendit, pravus aut industrius eadem vi, upon some spleen towards the Aga of the Janizaries, took occasion to cashier him, and sent him to the Islands to be strangled, and gave order to murther some other Bassaes and Officers, that so he might make way to depose Emperour Mustapha, and set up Morat the child, the brother of Osman, many being of his party; whereupon the souldiers rose all in armes at the Seraglio, taking the alarm at the medling with their Aga, rescued their Captain and the rest, and demanded the head of the Vizier, whereupon he fled, and order was given

Against whom they also rise in mutiny.

to

to kill him where he could first be found; the Viziers house was sacked, and infinite treasure taken, so that the souldier was quieted for a day or two by making a new Vizier Mustapha Bassa, who was of a soft nature, and scarce durst do justice for fear of offending any man. Now a new faction was made between Mustapha and Morat, and it was expected hourely, when there would be some great slaughter or Massacre in the City; for of necessity one side must fall.

"There was then no security for any man, when the King, "and Viziers, and all Officers held their lives and Dignities at "the courtesie of the mutinied souldiers, who had tasted the "sweet of Rebel ion, and cast off all awe and reverence, "and could not easily be reduced to order without much "blood and hazard of the whole. Therefore the WI- "SER MEN retyred from OFFICE, and the insufficient did cause their own daily change and RUINE. The "souldiers adhered to the King of their own Creation; for "he was in effect their creature, and they did wholly govern "him. The Lawyers and Churchmen made secret conven- "tions, and feared not to say openly, that the foundation of "their State was dissolved, their King unlawful, and all "that adhered to him lapped into heresie, having despised "the institutions of Mahomet.

All from the greatest to the least at the courtesie of the Army.

Against whom the Lawyers and Churchmen unite for the publick good.

The souldiers still continued in their mutinies at Constantinople, and grew to that height of insolency, that going in Troops to the Court, they demanded all Offices of Gaine; to be Stewards to the revenues of the Churches, which are great; to take Farmes of Customes, and committed many other outrages which are unsufferable; the Viziers themselves durst deny them nothing: if complaints of any insolencies or injuries were made to the chief Vizier or Magistrate, they answered, none durst meddle with them, that had murthered their own King; and desired the Complainants patience, and that they would bear a part with the general sufferings.

The souldiers demand the Churches Revenues, and all Offices of gain

By this time the wickedness of some of the chief Leaders in these commotions was ripe for vengeance, and their day is come. The great Vizier Georgi envying the authority of Daont Bassa brother in law to the Emperour, Mustapha who,

who had been the Counsellor and the instrument to murther Sultan Osman, scorning that he should underhand Govern in his Reigne, he therefore practised to put him to death; but not daring to do it by his own Authority, and knowing it to be in vaine to think to procure it from the Court, he stirred up the Spahies to demand justice upon him for the death of the last King. This looked further then the first assent; for the subtle Vizier, who was faithful to his true Lord, knowing the rage of an unguided multitude, aimed at a by-revenge upon others, who he hoped would be involved and accused of the order. The souldier soone raised and mutinied in the Seraglio, demanded Daout, he fled. But now that the businesse was on foot, if he were not found, the Vizier himself is in danger: but the poor man was taken, and brought to the Divan, and there being called to publick Justice, he must excuse himself upon some greater person; wherein the Emperour and his Mother ran a new hazard, which was the secret end. Therefore both of them forsook him and left him to the Law, and without any tryal, he was brought before the souldiers, stript, and his Turbant taken off, and on his knees ready to receive the stroke of death. But suddenly the Janizaries came to his rescue, and carried him away to their Chambers. The Spahies who began this action, took it in ill part, and followed with great out-cries, that they would have him die; the others demanded that he might be heard in publick Justice. Thus those two mutinied factions were ready to come to blows. Daout Bassa now in some hope of life bribed the Janizaries, and that day distributed fourty thousand Chequines of gold, and they promised to protect him. Who did not now think but he was taken away for safety? But the Spahies followed their first resolution, and to appease the dissension, it was agreed he should die. They that meant to save him, could not, but reserved him for a greater example of Justice. They would not let him now loose his head in the Court, that death was to honourable for him, that had murthered his Prince. Therefore they put him into the same Couch wherein he had sent Sultan Osman to Execution. Twice in the way, being dry, with sorrow he drank at the same Fountain

The Spahies set on by the present Vizier, demand justice for the death of their King, though occasioned by themselves.

Upon which the Army is divided into two Factions, and ready to fight.

To prevent them, he that murthered the King is delivered to justice.

where

where his late Master begged drink: and so was conveyed into the same Chamber, wherein he had murthered him. The Executioner beginning to tye him, himself shewed the very corner where he had committed that foul fact, and desired that there he might, if possible, expiate it. And so at last he was miserably strangled.

And here observe the justice of God even for the wicked, who seldome suffers the blood of any, scarce (if at all the blood of Kings) to passe without an exemplary retaliation; the same Couch, the same Chamber, the same Corner, the same Death. And observe again, the power of conscience, even in a Mahometan, able to make him, if not his own Executioner, yet almost a voluntary sacrifice to the Ghost of his murthered Prince.

Which yet is not so appeased, but must and will have yet more sacrifices; and to demand them, comes the Bassa of Arrivum, with a great Army towards Angria, marching the direct way to Constantinople. He held a general Counsel in his Camp, and sent to the Port to desire the "presence of the Mufti, Cadees, Bassa's and ancient Beghs "to take knowledge; and to punish the Traytours that mur- "thered the late King; and to settle a New one lawfully "that should be able to governe, to reduce the mutinied City souldier to obedience and discipline, and to place about the Emperour some great Vizier chosen by the State, able to direct and applie remedies to the diseases then grown to a Crisis. 'Complaining, that every three or four moneths, by 'the change of the Vizier, the Provinces were destroyed; for 'they placed and displaced the Governour according to 'their own Factions, and so contrary orders were sent abroad 'daily, insomuch that no man knew whom they should obey. 'These were his pretences; and if the present State would 'not assent to this Assembly, he then resolved to come to the 'Port, and settle all things at his pleasure by the sword. The Great Officers in possession of the Emperour and Government, loath to be called to account by the souldier, took a worse resolution to make a Warre, and make choice of Cigala Bassa for General, which he refused upon the same pretence, that in his absence alterations would be so frequent,

The Army abroad under the conduct of a great Commander, rise to avenge the death of their King; who calls a general Councel.

Makes Declarations of his honest intentions.

Against whom the Governor, set up by the mutinied Army, guilty of Osmans blood, proclaim a War.

and

and that he ſhould not pleaſe, or at leaſt uncertainly and according to interpretation. Therefore he would have an abſolute Dictatorſhip for the time, equal to that of the great Vizier, or elſe he would not ſtirre. This was granted him, and money given out, and order to paſſe the water, ſpeedily enrolling for his Army 15000. Janizaries, and 30000. Spahies. But thoſe did demur, and alleadge it was a War againſt their own BRETHREN, and ſought any excuſes, rather then to come to blowes. But the ſecret was, it was then Ramazan, or their holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receive their pay, and therefore they would not move, but pretended Religion. Next day after their Feaſt, when they ſhould march, they ſhewed themſelves careleſſe (having firſt held many conſultations) and would not march at all, unleſſe the Emperour or great Vizier would go in perſon: ſo every day brought forth new trouble, and the Empire to a great deal of hazard and danger.

☞ But the mutiniers demur, & pretend loathneſs to fight againſt their brethren, held conſultations, refuſe to march, ☜

'That State, for fifteen moneths after the death of Oſman, 'was a ſtage of variety, the ſouldiery uſurping all Govern-'ment; placing and diſplacing as the winde of favour or diſ-'favour moved them. In that time there were three Em-'perours, ſeven great Viziers, five Agaes of the Janizaries; 'Two Captain Baſſaes, three Treaſurers, ſix Baſſaes of Cai-'ro; and in proportion, as many changes of Governours 'in all the Provinces. Every new Vizier making uſe of his time, diſplacing thoſe in poſſeſſion, and ſelling their honour to others, ſo as the whole Empire was in a manner fined four or five times over. Hurein Baſſa the laſt Vizier of them, conſumed the publick treaſure ſo faſt, and exacted money of private men ſo violently to maintaine his Faction with the Janizaries, that even the receivers themſelves were afraid and weary, and the wiſeſt of them foreſaw their own ruine in the general conſumption; when there was any murmure againſt him, he preſently ſilenced it either by guifts or blood.

Yet at length perſwaded to move;

Aſſoon as he had diſpatched away Cigala Baſſa with his Army againſt the Baſſa of Arrivum, whom they termed the great Rebel in Aſia, which he did rather to disburden himſelf ſelf of fears by ſending the Spahies out of the way (who were his oppoſites) then for any love to the publick ſtate; he ſent privily to ſtrangle Halil Baſſa, Georgi, and Muſtapha, late Viziers, hoping thereby he had removed all competitors; whether this gave the occaſion, or that his ſinne was ripe for revenge, the Spahies ſuddenly gathered head, and the old wolf fled to his truſty Guard the Janizaries. The City was almoſt divided, but the Spahies ſent their reſolution plainly, being the weaker in number, that they were loth to come to blowes with their BRETHREN, but if the Janizaries would protect him, they ſhould keep him Conſtantinople and Greece. But they themſelves would depart, and diſpoſed of Aſia, which was a bold profeſſion, but eaſie, the forces of the Rebels being of their ſociety. The wiſeſt foreſaw the peril, and they all agreed to change him, and ſo the Seal was given to Ali Baſſa, a man reputed honeſt, but melancholick and unexperienced for ſo great a charge.

But upon new diſcontents the Spahies mutiny again.

Which quieted They march,

The Army for Aſia arriving at Nicomedia five dayes journey from Conſtantinople ſhewed little obedience, many disbanded, and the reſt having no deſire to fight with theſe of the ſame Profeſſion both in Religion and in humour. News came daily to the Port of the taking of Forts by Abaſſa Baſſa, the Head of the Rebels, and other deſections and combuſtions in thoſe parts, and that that quarrel was taken up againſt the Janizaries and the preſent Government, of whom he ſlew all that came into power, as guilty of the blood of Oſman. This ſudddenly waked and ripened the project of thoſe who had plotted an alteration. Hereupon the new Vizier Ali, with the Counſel of the Mufti, and ſome Captaines of the ſouldiers of both Orders laid their foundation. They SHEWED the imminent PERIL, and difficulty to reſiſt or prevent it by Armes. The Janizaries ſaw that they alone muſt, as the mark of Envy, bear the whole burthen; and therefore ALL RESOLVED that THE EASIEST and SAFEST WAY TO APPEASE THEIR TROUBLES WAS TO RESTORE THE TRUE HEIR; hoping that they who pretended their riſing for the love

But no mind to fight.

The Councel at Conſtantinople at their wits end.

They conſult.

Reſolve upon the onely expedient for ſafety.

of his brother, and in revenge of his cause, would obey that Prince, and quiet themselves; upon this resolution they assembled at the Seraglio without any tumult, and desired to have Sultan Mustapha come forth and speak to the souldiers, and to answer to some questions which he refusing as truly unable; they took out Sultan Morat, and declared him King with universal joy and acclamation, insomuch as the Janizaries (but the day before his opposites, so easily can God turne the heart of a multitude) being shewed the wants of Treasure, and the necessity of the State, were content to remit their Donative, and encrease of Pay usuall at every change, Vade tu O miles Anglicane & fac Simile. Go then O English Souldier, and do likewise.

Which is to declare for the right heir, and make him King, which is also done;

☞

Asia was in this new settlement of Affaires, either forgotten or neglected. The Army that was marching thither was stayed from proceeding. For it was believed that Abassa Bassa depended upon the new Emperour, and would make his submission: But they had proceeded too far to make any safe retreat, although they were the indirect (if not direct) occasion of the raising of the new Emperour. Besides there rested still another difficulty, to introduce the awe of Majesty, which had been trampled under foot (and it was a great one) 'when people, like the sea, had made a 'breach into ancient Reverence, and prospered, the taste 'of wickedness was not so easily lost.

In the midst of this appearing calme, the Janizaries, some repenting, and some denying that ever they consented, to remit the Donative or encrease of pay, did now sharply demand it with threats of innovation, so as they were forced to content them. About this, Abassa Bassa began to discover, that he had some further game to play, then the setting up of the Brethren of Osman; for notwithstanding all pretences of obedience to the new Emperour, he suddenly assaulted and took the Castle of Tocat, which is the Mint of Asia; seven Beglerbegs, and sixteen Sanracks, being joyned with him, all that part of Asia obeyed him; for he oppressed none, onely executing his wrath upon the

Yet the Janizaries mutiny again for their pay.

The Army in Asia still prosecure their pretences.

Cruel to the Janizaries, but just & friendly to all others.

Jani-

Janizaries. This advice being brought by a Captain of that Order made much rumour at the Port; the ſouldiers riſing in tumult at the Seraglio, demanded to be led out to fight, and to have theſe of Aſia declared Rebels; a Counſel to this end was held, where they received ſo cold an anſwer, that they grew into ſome rage, accuſing two Baſſaes, by name, Hali and Georgi to have correſpondence with them; and ſeeming to doubt that the whole State did connive with this action, to proſecute the firſt deſign of Oſman to root out the Order of the Janizaries; inſomuch as they openly profeſſed, if we be true Muſulmans, and the Emperours ſlaves, let us go out and fight with his Enemies and ours; if not, and that you maintain them againſt us, we are reſolved to die together, and not to be waſted by pieces. Therefore to ſatisfie the ſouldiers, the Banner was ſet out at the Gate of the Court, and that of the Aga of the Janizaries at their Gate, and Warre proclaimed. That all the force of the Empire ſhould be ready to march within four dayes; when they ſaw this reſolution in the great Ones (whether diſſembled or in good earneſt) that day being Octob. 18. 1623. The Janizaries and Spahies held a Counſel, and changed their mindes, alleadging, that Winter approaching, and no proviſion made, they would not move. The Viziers were glad, reſpecting their own ends, and ſo all Aſia was left to the courteſie of the Rebels and Winter. In the mean time Abaſſa Baſſa advanced, and took the City of Angria, which was ſurrendred to him as ſoon as he came before it, but the Caſtle held againſt him; and it is reported, 'That he wept at 'the Gates thereof, publiſhing the cauſe of his taking 'up of Armes, which he ſaid was onely in revenge of the 'blood of Oſman, deſiring ſuch as favoured him to come 'on his ſide, the reſt to depart in peace every man to his 'own houſe. He did no harme, nor took the value of a 'penny: His Army was very great, and every Janizary 'that he could catch, he ſacrificed to the Ghoſt of the dead 'Emperour. The Aſtrologers publickly augured his proſpe- 'rity; and every mans diſcourſe was full of fabulous fears

Whereupon the Ianizaries demand to be led out to fight them.

War proclaimed, the Army to march within four days.

Whereupon the Army held a Counſel, and change their Mindes.

By which news all Aſia's left to the other Army.

of his brother, and in revenge of his cause, would obey that Prince, and quiet themselves; upon this resolution they assembled at the Seraglio without any tumult, and desired to have Sultan Mustapha come forth and speak to the souldiers, and to answer to some questions which he refusing as truly unable; they took out Sultan Morat, and declared him King with universal joy and acclamation, insomuch as the Janizaries (but the day before his opposites, so easily can God turne the heart of a multitude) being shewed the wants of Treasure, and the necessity of the State, were content to remit their Donative, and encrease of Pay usuall at every change, Vade tu O miles Anglicane & fac Simile. Go then O English Souldier, and do likewise.

Which is to declare for the right heir, and make him King, which is also done;

Asia was in this new settlement of Affaires, either forgotten or neglected. The Army that was marching thither was stayed from proceeding. For it was believed that Abassa Bassa depended upon the new Emperour, and would make his submission: But they had proceeded too far to make any safe retreat, although they were the indirect (if not direct) occasion of the raising of the new Emperour. Besides there rested still another difficulty, to introduce the awe of Majesty, which had been trampled under foot (and it was a great one) 'when people, like the sea, had made a 'breach into ancient Reverence, and prospered, the taste 'of wickedness was not so easily lost.

In the midst of this appearing calme, the Janizaries, some repenting, and some denying that ever they consented, to remit the Donative or encrease of pay, did now sharply demand it with threats of innovation, so as they were forced to content them. About this, Abassa Bassa began to discover, that he had some further game to play, then the setting up of the Brethren of Osman; for notwithstanding all pretences of obedience to the new Emperour, he suddenly assaulted and took the Castle of Tocat, which is the Mint of Asia; seven Beglerbegs, and sixteen Sanracks, being joyned with him, all that part of Asia obeyed him; for he oppressed none, onely executing his wrath upon the

Yet the Janizaries mutiny again for their pay.

The Army in Asia still prosecure their pretences.

Cruel to the Janizaries, but just & friendly to all others.

Jani-

Janizaries. This advice being brought by a Captain of that Order made much rumour at the Port; the ſouldiers riſing in tumult at the Seraglio, demanded to be led out to fight, and to have theſe of Aſia declared Rebels; a Counſel to this end was held, where they received ſo cold an anſwer, that they grew into ſome rage, accuſing two Baſſaes, by name, Hali and Georgi to have correſpondence with them; and ſeeming to doubt that the whole State did connive with this action, to proſecute the firſt deſign of Oſman to root out the Order of the Janizaries; inſomuch as they openly profeſſed, if we be true Muſulmans, and the Emperours ſlaves, let us go out and fight with his Enemies and ours; if not, and that you maintain them againſt us, we are reſolved to die together, and not to be waſted by pieces. Therefore to ſatisfie the ſouldiers, the Banner was ſet out at the Gate of the Court, and that of the Aga of the Janizaries at their Gate, and Warre proclaimed. That all the force of the Empire ſhould be ready to march within four dayes; when they ſaw this reſolution in the great Ones (whether diſſembled or in good earneſt) that day being Octob. 18. 1623. The Janizaries and Spahies held a Counſel, and changed their mindes, alleadging, that Winter approaching, and no proviſion made, they would not move. The Viziers were glad, reſpecting their own ends, and ſo all Aſia was left to the courteſie of the Rebels and Winter. In the mean time Abaſſa Baſſa advanced, and took the City of Angria, which was ſurrendred to him as ſoon as he came before it, but the Caſtle held againſt him; and it is reported, 'That he wept at 'the Gates thereof, publiſhing the cauſe of his taking 'up of Armes, which he ſaid was onely in revenge of the 'blood of Oſman, deſiring ſuch as favoured him to come 'on his ſide, the reſt to depart in peace every man to his 'own houſe. He did no harme, nor took the value of a 'penny: His Army was very great, and every Janizary 'that he could catch, he ſacrificed to the Ghoſt of the dead 'Emperour. The Aſtrologers publickly augured his proſpe- 'rity; and every mans diſcourſe was full of fabulous fears

Whereupon the Ianizaries demand to be led out to fight them.

War proclaimed, the Army to march within four days.

Whereupon the Army held a Counſel, and change their Mindes.

By which news all Aſia's left to the other Army.

'and Propheſies. It was ſaid he would come to the Port and demand audience by juſtice. And it was generally thought from the coldneſſe, both of the Emperour, and of the Viziers, that he was ſecretly maintained by them, and that he came to fulfil the deſign of Oſman, to wreſt the Government from the mutinied ſouldiers, and to root out their Order. For all the Lawyers and Churchmen ſmiled, and rather rejoyced then feared. The Janizaries openly murmured, that they were betrayed, and accuſed many, yet they eſcaped, and now few ſpoke againſt him as a Rebel; yet the firſt of November (whether for colour or in earneſt) the great Viziers Tents were paſſed over the water in haſte with theſe of the Aga of the Janizaries, and all the force which could be then made at the Court, to Winter on the other ſide in Bruſia, to amuſe the rebels, and ſtay them till the Spring, being willing the blow ſhould be taken on the other ſide to ſave the Citie from a Generall ſack.

The Baſſa of Aſia taken into the Emperours favour;

It was afterwards conſidered, that to prevaile againſt Abaſſa Baſſa with Armes was a doubtfull matter, and therefore the Sultan ſent to him a Capigi Baſſa, with a Veſt, a Sword, and a Letter, giving him thanks for the love ſhewed to his brother and his Blood: But that now the Revenge belonged to him himſelf, of which he would take care; and therefore deſired him, 'If he were a true ſub-'ject to return to his Government of Arrivum, and to 'diſſolve his Armies, and there to reſt until further occaſion 'of ſervice. Upon this Order from the Emperour he excu-

Promiſeth to lay down Arms.

ſeth himſelf; That the incommodity of Winter would not ſuffer him to retire, but promiſed to live in peace untill the Spring, and then he would returne in obedience to his Government.

New Vizier choſen at the Port.

About which time, namely, March 24. 1624. Ali Baſſa the great Vizier was beheaded, and Cerques Mechemet Baſſa advanced to the place, a man of an honeſt and ſincere nature (for a Mahometan) and one too good for thoſe times, and that people, who after he had enjoyed his place (one of the greateſt Dignities in the world) but a

ſhort

ſhort while, by an example ſcarce to be paralleſ'd, laboured to ſurrender it as unable to ſupport or content the inſolency of the Spahies in their unreaſonable demands of impoſſible benefits. In the mean time the preparation for the War in Aſia (which had been once again impeded) was advanced, though the reſolution to ſet forward was deferred upon hope, that Cherques Mechemet Baſſa, and other new Miniſters might by their perſwaſion and authority reduce Abaſſa Baſſa, looked on, they having undertaken to endeavour it; though it appeared very difficult, being that he yet continued the ſiege of Angria, and that his ſcattered Army that Wintered abroad began to return to him from all Parts, and it was concluded he would be loath to truſt his life upon a pardon, though the Grand Seignior had ſent him another.

Yet ſuddenly (contrary to the feares of many, and the expectations of almoſt all) Abaſſa Baſſa roſe from Angria, and departed Eaſtward, having done no ſpoile at all to the City nor Inhabitants, but left behinde him a farre better fame then any Governour ſent from the Port; he had now accepted the Grand Signiors pardon, and in obedience to his Command and ſhew of ſubmiſſion was now marched away to unite his Forces with Achis Achmet Baſſa againſt the Perſian; yet whatever might ſeeme to be between the Port and him, there was not ſo much as a ſeeming reconciliation between him and the Janizaries: for after this the Janizaries coming over into Aſia with Cerques Mehemet Baſſa againſt the Perſian, put a whole Garriſon of Abaſſa Baſſaes to the ſword, man, woman, and childe, though they had ſet open their Gates to entertain them as friends. In revenge whereof Abaſſa Baſſa falling in upon the quarters of the Janizaries, ſlew 3000. of them, and had done further execution, if the whole Army had not come to reſcue.

And withdraws his forces.

This was the ſtate of affaires abroad; in the meane time at Conſtantinople the Spahies aſſembled in the Hippodrome, diſcontent with the Government of the old Chimacham, Georgi Mechemet Baſſa, who had the Authority of the great

The Spahies again mutiny; And Cause the old Chimacham to be put to death

great Vizier in his absence at the Warre, and in great fury ran to the house of the Mufti, and demanded of him to donounce sentence of death against him, and that he would rise and inform the Grand Signior of Their Will; which if he refused, they threatned a general revolt, and to do their own justice; There was no remedy, the Emperour being informed instantly, displaced him, and gave the Office to Regeb Captain Bassa, and his to Imbraher Bassa, hoping thus to quiet all the matter: but this gave them no satisfaction, they demanded in greater fury his life. The poor old man was retyred into the Grand Signiors protection, who used all means to appease them offering to banish or confine him; but nothing would content, or separate them, until he had delivered him up, who the next day was strangled, and thrown into the streets; where the Barbarians vented their spleen upon his dead bodie, cutting off his eares and nose, and carrying them in triumph to their fellows. Presently they demand the life of some others, principally of Moret Chiaus the Customer, whom when they could not find, they sacked his house; within a day or two after they began to be quiet, upon promise, that if he could be found, he should be rendred to them, and others be brought to Justice. That great Minister the Chimacham was ninty six yeares old, had been fourty five years Vizier, their Chimacham; when the sentence of his condemnation was delivered to the Bostangi Bassa, he came to the lodging of the Chimacham in the Kings Garden (where he thought himselfe in Sanctuary) and for reverence to his age and place, held it, being written in his hand, rather to intimate them to be the Messengers. 'The poor old man perceiving it, desired 'one houre to pray, and conjured him to warn the Grand 'Signior hereafter not to be so easie to consent to 'shed innocent blood, which within a few dayes he would 'repent. The Executioners, whether for fear, or for want 'of skill, could not dispatch him in one houre, so great 'was his old heart.

But see how God, to whom vengeance belongeth, avength the blood of his enemies, and wicked men unjustly spilt, spilt, to preserve his image even amongst them that study to destroy it. The Janizaries either envious that they had no part in the last sedition, or being innocent, unwilling to participate in the infamy, or rather it was their faire to do somewhat, forced the Boats of the Gallies which lay above Constantinople in the channel, and came down to a Garden-house upon the Sea in the night, where the Emperour privately reposed, and began to exclaime against the death of the innocent, protesting they had no share therein, but as obedient slaves, they desired the peace of the State, and that JUSTICE and QUIETNESSE miget returne to the City: and requiring revenge upon divers whom they accused as the Authours of these Tumults: 'They named their own Segmen Bassa as the principal, and eighteen of their own 'Officers more, and divers others of the chiefe Spahies, 'who held Counsels together, and were become heads of 'Factions; which untill they were All cut off, there was 'no hope of good Government and peace. The Grand 'Signior gave them mild words, and promised to do Justice, 'and to punish all such as should be found guilty, but nothing was done to satisfie them; and being conceived that the new Chimacham connived, and had been a party to all their Counsels (at least his preferment made him obnoxious to that suspition) and it was true that Segmen Bassa and his faction were the contrivers of the fall and murther of Georgi Mechemet Bassa, and very probable that he was favoured, if not practised by the new Ministers: the Janizaries rose again, and by force brought down the Galleys neer the City, and landed, and held a Counsel very secret in their Chambers. This bred much suspition and feare. But the day of publick audience being come, according to the custome, they repaired all to the Seraglio, and waited in their Order; their Segmen Bassa onely did not appear, and it was thought he absented himselfe purposely, by agreement with the Chimacham, lest there should be some occasion offered to examine the past businesse which would not endure the light. The Divan being finish-

The Janizaries rise,

Declare against this act of their fellow souldiers, the Spahies.

Desire justice against divers of their own Officers, and the Officers of the Spahies, as men that had debauched the Army, and led them into, and encouraged them in all their mutinies;

Accusing them of Factions, and holding Conventicles and Counsels.

finiſhed, the Viziers and Cadeleſchers coming towards the Gate, they were ſtopped by the Janizaries, and told plainly they would ſpeak with the King; ſuch perſwaſions as were requiſite were uſed; but there was no remedy, they would deliver their own meſſage. The young Emperour at firſt was afraid, and retyred; but to avoyd greater inconveniences reſolved to come out to them. Order was inſtantly given to ſend for the Mufti, and the ancients of the Law, and many Santons; for the Segmen Baſſa, and others of quality to be preſent at this action. In the mean time a Throne was brought out, and placed in the great Court, and the Grand Segmen came forth and ſate in his Majeſtie, attended and aſſiſted by all the great Officers and Miniſters of his Empire, to ſtrike a reverence and fear into his ſouldiers, whoſe purpoſes were not yet diſcovered. Contrary to all expectation, an Electo ſpake for them; 'In all humble manner profeſſing their 'obedience, and lamenting the ſickneſſe of their State, and 'the daily inſolencies; and declaring that as they were 'not guilty of the laſt mutiny, ſo they were ready to ſpend 'their blood in defence of their PRINCE. And for the 'Reformation of thoſe diſorders, to which there could be 'applied no remedy, but by the ſword of Juſtice to cut 'off all thoſe heads, that hold Conventicles, and plotted 'daily alterations, onely to governe the whole Empire at 'their Will. They deſired their Petition might be ac'cepted, and thoſe diſturbers of the Peace ſought out and 'executed, in which they would aſſiſt; and that new 'Names and Titles might be forbidden; which many had 'taken up as heads of Factions, and the Souldiery reduced 'to their ancient Diſcipline; which if his Majeſty would 'grant, and ſpeedily put in practiſe, they were ready to die 'in his ſervice; otherwiſe, as there was no hope of quiet'neſſe, ſo they did foreſee greater miſchiefs daily, which 'they would oppoſe as they were able. At the end of this Oration, which might have become a Cato (yea, a Chriſtian, Vade tu Miles Anglicane, & fac Simile, Go thou Engliſh ſouldier and do likewiſe) they delivered a

The Ianizaries come to the Port and deſire Peace.

All the Grandees of the Empire aſſemble together. One in the name of the reſt, delivers firſt a ſpeech, then a Petition

Both fitter for States-men then ſouldiers, for Chriſtians then Turks.

brief

brief Petition in writing wherein they modestly accused the 'new Chimacham of confederacy, and connivence with 'their Segmen Bassa, whom they anew appealed and gave 'up the Names of their Officers and Spahies, upon whom 'they laid the burthen of their daily tumults.

The Emperour gave them a short but satisfactory answer, yeelding to their request, yet mingled with some admonition, such as became a Prince. And so they departed every man to their own rest. But the Segmen Bassa having some intimation that his name was renued in that list of death, took the first opportunity, fled and hid himself, and divers others conscious of their own merits retyred, and thereby condemned themselves. With much diligence the Segmen Bassa was apprehended and brought to the Court, he was examined rather to finde his own Treasure, which was infinite, then to discover other men. The Grand Signior sent for him, and after a few words, gave sentence to have his head struck off, which was instantly done before the door; afterwards divers of both Orders (that is Janizaries and Spahies) were taken to the number of twenty two, were taken, and privately stangled and thrown into the sea; these (principally branded) were hidden or fled. And suddenly, as if peace were risen out of the old Chimachams grave, there was an end of the tumults and disorders among the souldiers; the Spahies shrunk, not one revenging Spahie to be seen in all the City; and the Janizaries, as their glory, took upon them an austere Reformation; and all things were so calme as if Astrea had come down from heaven among them.

The Segmen Bassa, the man principally accused, hides himself, but being found is put to death, with some 22. others of both Orders.

After which the Army returns to their duty, and peace to the Empire.

THe reading of History having in it no recompense but delight, unlesse it look forward to use and action, either to correct errors past, or direct wayes for the future: it will not be unprofitable upon the foregoing discourse to raise som Observations, First Theological. Secondly, Moral and Political.

First, Theological. There are in this discourse several things of God discovered, worthy our taking notic of.

As first the absolute and uncontroulable Soveraignty of God over the greatest Monarchs and Emperors of the world.

Behold one of the greatest Monarchs of the earth, suddenly turned out of all, by his own Vassals, who at their first rising intended no such thing. He cuts off the spirit of Princes; he is terrible to the Kings of the earth, Psal. 76. 12.

Secondly, observe here the infinite wisdome of God, who can by the Passions, and lusts, and furies of men accomplish his own, wise, and just holy ends. This Army in all their mad fury did not what themselves plotted and intended, but what God decreed.

Thirdly, behold here the exact justice of God (in revenging first the blood of Osman, then the blood of Georgi, though wicked men) to his Enemies; shall he not much more avenge the blood of his Elect?

Fourthly, observe here the wonderful power of God over the spirits of men; how soon can the Lord calme their greatest rage and fury? and none can do it but he; he stilleth the raging of the sea, and the tumults of the people.

For Moral Observations take these.

First, how dangerous a thing it is for any supream power to stand in need of a constant standing Army; they do but bestride an unruly Camel, which they cannot manage, as this unfortunate Osman dreamt, before his death.

Secondly, what a dangerous thing it is for the Civil Power, to permit the souldiers and Officers of the Army to hold their Counsels and Conventicles. These were the root of all these troubles in the Turkish Empire.

Thirdly, how much better it is to be under the worst of Monarchies, then at the courtesie of a mutinied Army, appears by this story.

Fourthly, that the common souldier having been debauched by their own Officers, may at last prove honest, and delivering their misleaders to Justice, may return to their duty and obedience. Amen.

FINIS.